TO THE

COMMONS of Great-Britain.

Brethren, Freemen, Fellow-Subjects!

UR Condition at present feems to resemble that of a Ship's Crew, escaped from the Fury of a Tempest, and beyond their own Expectations, arrived fafely on Shore. That we should dedicate a few Moments to the Expression of our Joy, on so great a Deliverance is not strange, but certainly it becomes us to take Care after this happy Event at Sea, not to subject ourselves to new Dangers on Land, by forgetting to take the necessary Precautions, for fixing fafely where we find ourselves at prepresent. Our Perils were caused by others; our Security must be a Work of our own.

We have often heard it said, that the People are mutable, irrefolute, and incapable of taking Advice; we have heard this particularly applied to Britans, as if we were infected with these Follies in the highest Degree. We have in some Measure vindicated ourselves, by the Vigour and Steadiness of our Conduct for some Years past. It remains that we persist with like Resolution, till we have gain'd what we sought, and reap'd the Fruit of our long continued Toils.

To set the Expediency, and even the Necessity of this in a clear Light, to shew you what we have been seeking, and how happy we shall be, if we acquire what we fought, is the Business of the following Pages; wherein I have endeavoured to be succines without Obsarity, and to express myself plainly, but with Decency. I know that your Freedom is derived from, and must be protected by Laws; and therefore I have shewn you from Reason, and the Authority of the greatest Patriots, what Laws are wanting to make you for ever free.

Far from defiring to give you bigh Ideas of your own Power, to encourage you to loud Clamours on Pretence of Rights, or to raise your Authority above that of the Legislature, I have shewn you the legal Path, which will lead you to all just Purposes, without transgressing the Bounds of Moderation; and having done this, I hope I shall be entitled to your Protection, if my Freedom in Discourse should expose me [as I am not conscious it will] to the Displeasure of any.

[viii]

Countrymen,

I have but a few Words more to the : Be loyal to your Prince, obedient to the Laws, united amongst sourfelves, and Corruption will never be able to enervate the Strength of, your Government again, nor will any foreign Focs be able to look you in the Face. The Love of Liberty, and a just Concern for Property, will make every Briton a Soldier, if invaded from Abroad; and our just Title to the Sovereignty of the Seas, will ever be maintained by the Valour of our Seamen, if the Constitution flourish at home.

Adieu

Independant Briton.

S Quarrels amongst Friends are best prevented by free Expositulations, so it seems to be the most natural Way of avoiding public Disturbances, to hear patiently the Sentiments of a free People. We have been lately told, and I doubt not with Truth, that some great Men desire nothing so much as to have their Power sanctified by the Voice of the Nation, and to be sure this is a wise Choice, especially at this Time, when we have had so late, and so strong an Example of the Power of the Nation's Voice, with respect to the Great, and the Possibility there is, that popular Dislike may affect a Man, however strengthened by political Arts, or encircled by a Crowd of Dependants.

There

There are indeed fome who have fuggested, that the People are very unfit Judges of the Conduct of Ministers, because Experience shews that they are very hard to be pleased, as on the other Hand it is apparent enough, that the right Management of public Affairs is a Point out of their reach, whence it is inferred, that it would be better for them to mind their private Concerns. But fuch Men conclude too hastily, the People are far from being unreatonable in their Demands, or infensible of good Usage; on the contrary, they are very ready to bear with Disappointments and Inconveniences, when they are satisfied of their Governors good Intentions, and then as to the Measure of their Understanding, though it be true that all Men are not born Politicians, yet it is not very eafy for Folks to live in the World without feeling; whence it falls out, that when a Nation is fenfibly distressed, it will scarce be brought to believe that it is well governed, nor will Men have any great Heart to attend their private Concerns, when their Minds are full of Doubts as to the public Safety. It would be hard to beat a Cabin Boy for not cleaning bis Knives, when the Ship was finking.

Sir Paul Ricaut, who was a very agreeable, and at the fame time a very fenfible Writer, tells us an odd Story of a Cook that was made Prime Minister in Turky, and behaved very well in his Station. It fell out thus, there was at Constantinople so great a Scarcity of Provisions that such as went not to Market early, were in Danger of coming home without a Dinner. This happened one Day to be the Case of a Cook to a Chamber of Janissaries, an Accident hindered him from being fo foon as usual at the Shambles, and when he came, there was no Meat left. He knew and dreaded the Reception he should meet with at his Return, and fancying that he felt the Cudgel of the Chief of the Chamber about his Shoulders for this Misfortune, he let his Tongue run at a strange Rate. The Grand Seignior, faid he, must needs have bad Ministers about him, that things run to this strange Pass, and that in the Capital of so great an Empire, a Man at nine o'Clock shall be at a Loss for a Joint of Mutton, and that with Money in his Hand too. A Plague of fuch Counsellors fay I, now will my Bones juffer for their Faults, with this additional Curje, that for ought I know, I may be next Week in the same Condition.

As he went thus raving and swearing along the Street, the Grand Scignior came by in Disguise, and seeing a Man in so great an Agony, asked him civilly what was the Matter. Why there it is, answered the Cook, I shall get much by telling you the Matter, when you have heard it, you'll say I am a poor Dog, and that it is no great Matter, yet none but the Grand Signior can help the Matter; but my Family will loose their Dinner, and I shall be drubbed; confound all evil Counsellors say I. The Sultan still continued to press him to a more particular Explanation, and having at last brought him into a little better Temper, he proceeded in these Words.

 $_{\mathrm{B}}$ 2 whe

Why look you Friend, I am a Cook to a Chamber of Janislavies, I came abroad to-day, it may be half an Hour later than usual, there is not an Ounce of Meat left at the Butchers, I must go home now with my Fingers in my Mouth, and the comfortable News, that for this Day we must fast. The Grand Vizir and his worthy Affociates, are to thoroughly employed in enriching themselves, that they have no time to enquire, whether other People have any thing to eat; if I were Vizir, I would undertake to have the Markets well supplied, or be cut into Pound Pieces, and now, what have you got by hearing my Tale, or what am I the better for telling it? Things will ftill go on thus, till Matters mend above, I tell you as I told you before, no-body but the Grand Seignior can remedy this Grievance, little as it may feem, and so Good b'ye t'ye, I will go take a Beating as patiently as I can. The

The Grand Signior returning to his Palace, and confidering of the Discourse the Janizaries Cook had made him, whether to prove the Abilities of the Man, or because he conceived Providence had offered this Encounter, or that Princes delight to exercife their Power in raising up great Men from nothing, so it was, that he fent immediately for the Cook, who being come into his Prefence, and fenfible of the familiar Discourse he had made him, trembling, cast himself down at his Feet, supposing that the free Language he used of the Vizier, and the Government, was the Cause he was now to lose his Life. It happen'd quite otherwise, the Sultan kindly bid him lay aside his Fear, told him, he was refolved to make him Grand Vizier, in order to fee whither he would keep his Word, and remedy the Grievances he had complained of, and that he might not transgress those Customs which are held facred among the Turks, he first made him Chief of his Chamber, the next Day Captain, the Day following Aga of the Janissaries, and thence at a Step, Grand Vizier. A good Minister he proved, no great Politician indeed, but to make Amends extremely bonest, and one that meant well to his Master, and to the People.

Instances of this Sort, are common enough among the Turks, and are agreeable to the Genius

Genius of their Government, which is tyrannical and violent; a Minister who incurs the Displeasure of his Prince, lives not an Hour, and in a Week's Time the Vizier is destroyed, who is upon bad Terms with the People. It is the fame Thing in other Countries in Effect, tho' the length of Time such Revolutions take up alter their Appearance, at least to unattentive Spectators. Publick Calamities when they are not brought upon a Nation by Providence, are the Refult of Male-Administration; and to tell the People that this is not their Affair. is to tell them a Falfhood, to bid them not trouble themselves about it, is to bid them be insensible. The only Remedy in fuch Cases is a Change of Measures, and whenever the Prince is wife enough to make fuch a Change, he will certainly have the Goodness to make it known to his Subjects. Their Interests are his, he can only be great in confequence of their being happy; whence it is clear, that unless their Happiness be understood and meant by him and his Ministers, neither he nor they can be easy, and this it is that makes a free People more likely to be happy, than fuch as live under an arbitrary Government; because the former are allow'd to discuss this Subject, which must render it more plain and familiar, whereas the latter dare never talk about it, so that Prince and People

People may labour whole Ages under the groffest Mistakes.

I could give the Reader an Instance of a Nation not in the Indies, where the Monarch is thoroughly perfuaded, that his Grandeur consists in the managing the Affairs of every other Kingdom but his own; that he becomes powerful by fending great Armies out of his own Country, to be knock'd on the Head in other People's Quarrels, and that he is to be a Gainer by remitting all the Money, that he can wrap and rend to Folks, who were never known to refund half a Crown fince they knew it would fetch thirty Pence; and what is still more extraordinary, many of this King's Subjects, are content to believe that whatever he accounts his Glory, must be their Felicity; at which rate of Reckoning, they may be very shortly the most happy People in the World, without Bread to eat or Clothes to cover them. Now it is plain, that if they were free they could never fall into fuch monstrous Errors as these, nor in Consequence of their falling into them, could they be made the Instruments of Plague and Punishment to other Nations. It is the Property of Slaves, that they are ready to do, as well as to fuffer any thing that comes into their Master's Heads, and therefore they are equally dangerous as Allies or Neighbours, the only Way to be fafe from them is to keep them at the Staffs End, and to use them with as little Ceremony as they meet with from their Masters, nay their very Condition requires it.

A miserable Condition this for any People to be in, and yet how far were we from it? Slavery did not invade us indeed in a terrifying Manner, we were treated fo gently, that many apprehended themselves to be in no Danger, and laughed at those who thought otherwise. Lethargies are as fatal as Convulsions, and the Patient is in the greatest Danger, when he has the least Sense of his Disease. We are now to come under other Hands, under the Hands of those who have rescued us from the perilous State we were in, and the Defign of this Pamphlet is to shew, what Treatment we may expect from them. That we have a right to speak upon this Occasion cannot be denied; they have often encouraged us to speak, by affuring us that we had such a Right. Farther still they have led us by their own Example, they spoke what they thought, and fo may we; especially if we proceed upon found Principles, on the Maxims of natural Equity, and of our Antient Constitution. These are what we ought to glory in defending, and from which we ought to think it Sacrilege to fwerve. But to be particular.

Since

Since we have fo lately escaped, fo eminent a Danger, we cannot provide too early against a Return of the Dijeaje; when the Body is in an ill Habit, a Dif-temper is not easily shaken off, it may be removed for a time, and recur with double Violence; our Business is not to be weary of Physic too foon, but to be content to use proper Medicines till the Cure is perfected. We have shook off our old Masters it's true, but this is nothing, if there be any Danger left of our having new ones, let us eradicate the Core of Slavery, let all Tendency to an Anti-Constitutional Dependance be rooted out, this was what we complained of heretofore, and it certainly imports as much that we may never have it to complain of again; for should a Set of Men at any time, arise capable of playing a back Game, we are undone, our Manner of moving is discovered, the new Players would so mind their Hits, that we should not foon meet with a Blot; to be fure of winning, we must push now before the Tables are full. The Case is so clear, it's Importance so great, and so minisest, that nothing can hurt us but our own Supineness, it we are beat we must be Bubbles, for with proper Attention, Success may be fecured.

The great Point to be aimed at, is the Prefervation of our Liberty, by removing all all the Impediments which can hinder the People from acting freely, and this, let them arise from what Causes they will. If Freedom was once thoroughly felt, it would be so generally understood, and it's Worth be so fully known, that all Distinctions of Party would be lost, there would not be a Man amongst us to whom the Thoughts of Slavery, shall I say, no, nor of Dependance would be tolerable. We should all move then in our respective Spheres, act upon Principle, and do what we take to be our Duty; whereas, while any Relicks of Corruption remain, we shall be governed by Foreign Impressions, and be guided like Machines, according to the Will and Humour of those in whose Hands we are. All who are acquainted with the late and present State of Politics, and dare think, and judge for themselves, will know what I say to be true, tho' they may ftill have their particular Reasons for not owning it, or even for affecting to treat tuch a Proposition as wild and chimerical, or at least impracticable. But Experience has shewn us the contrary, the same Force which has thrown off a Part of our Load, may throw off the Rest, let us adhere firmly to the Constitution in Church and State; and as for any Tyes that our Fellow Subjects would impose, let us confider them as ignominious Badges, let us disdain to impose impose on others, or to be imposed upon ourselves. Amongst a free People all Distinctions are accidental; there is a legal Submission due to Government, which in fact is the Fine we pay for Liberty; if any Attempt to lay more upon our Shoulders, we ought to convince them early of our Mission by heaching their Chairs in Pieces and take, by breaking their Chains in Pieces, and casting their Cords from us.

The People of Great Britain may be confidered in feveral Capacities, but in whatever Capacities they are confidered, it may be affirmed that they have a Right to Liberty. This they derive from the Constitution, and the there are particular Liberties annex'd to Property, yet some there are which belong even to the meanest, and which every Man may claim who is born a Briton. Amongst these I reckon a Title to Freedom in Speech and in Writing, or in other Words, of Discourse and of the Press. All are ready enough to affert this, when they are angry with Power, or think it ill used, but the Mischief is, that when Men are possessed of Power, they are apt to change their Opinions, and against this we ought to be guarded; I mean we ought to have this Point settled, so as to be free from all Apprehentions, especially those under which our Patriots have laboured for many Years past.

I would not be understood to be an Advocate for mobbing or railing, I detest both. But as an ill Use may be made of these Words, methinks it would be reasonable, to take away the Poffibility of confounding a legal well intended Meeting of the King's Subjects, with a Riot, or a free and rational Discourse, with a Libel. Let Sedition be punished in Actions or in Words, but let us know exactly what Sedition is, for other-wife he who bates it most may chance to suffer for it. I do not pretend to dictate upon this Subject, I know this is not the Business of private Men, but I must confess that I think as Things now stand, we ought to have some clear and explicit Declaration in Favour of the Liberty of the Press, for which I could offer many Reasons, but I will content my self with one. The Use that has been made of the Press feems to merit this, by it Patriots have been raised to Power, and therefore in Gratitude they ought to exert their Power in its Favour. I know but two Objections that can be made against this, and I think to each of these I can give a full Answer.

The first is this, that in critical Conjunctures, the best Government that can be imagined, may be in Danger from licentious Writings, and therefore it ought not to be expected, that such as are intrusted with the Government

Government, should countenance any Law for farther securing the Liberty of the Press.

To this I say, that the Objection begs the Question; that no good Government can be in Danger from any Writings whatfoever; or supposing it might be in Danger, restraining the Press is not the proper Remedy. Our Creator has left our Thoughts free, and placed them out of the Reach of Restraint from others, which shews, since he is all wise, that no kind of Restriction on Sentiment, is necessary to serve good Purposes. If Men write Falsities against the Government, they may be refuted either in a legal or in a rational Way, and I am not against either of these Methods. But if a Thing cannot be proved either false or mischievous, I do not think that publishing of it ought to be criminal. Nor is it clear, that any thing has been got by this. There are three eminent Instances of Attempts against the Liberty of the Press, in our own Nation, and very near our own Times. The first was by the Prelates in the Days of Queen Elizabeth, King James, and King Charles 1st. and the End they proposed was quelling of Puritans, but instead of succeeding, they threw the Weight of Popular Pity into the oppofite Scale, and thereby made those they perfecuted too heavy for themselves. The se-cond Instance was under Gromwell: He took it into his Head to gag the Press, by profecuting was defeated, and instead of hindering Printing, these violent Measures encouraged it. The like happened in the Reigns of Charles and James II. and has happened ever since, when this Notion of suppressing Papers has prevailed; for it is in Policy, what stopping Secretions is in Physick, a dangerous and empirical Practice, which throws the bad Humours into the Mass of Blood, and thereby corrupts the whole Body. So long as we continue free, there can be no Pretence for such a Conduct. An Administration cannot be called good, that will take Advantage of idle Suggestions, nor will be long esteem'd so, if they have no other Way of resulting such as are plausible, but by directing Prosecutions.

The fecond Objection is, that there feems to be no Occasion for this, the Liberty of the Press appearing to be better established at present, than it ever was in this Kingdom; the Restraints thereon being general only, and such as may be thought necessary to secure the Government from the Efforts of such wild and sactious Spirits, as never can be satisfied with, or easy under any Administration.

But when we examine this closely, it will be found a Composition of Falshood and Artifice. The Liberty of the Ercs is at present very precarious, and that which is urged to prove it otherwise, will, when duly weigh'd, shew it to be precarious. If it has been vigorously exercised of late, without meeting with any Opposition from Power, tho' pointed directly against it, it was owing wholly to the Weakness of the Administration; the Force of which was worn out, by a long and well-conducted Opposition, and the Eyes of the People so effectually opened, that it would not have been easy to have found a Jury in any County, capable of acting so contrary to the Senje of the Nation, as to serve the Purposes of a Prosecu-tion; but this may not be the Case here-after, the Law, or at least the Pretence of the Law, stands as it did. There is a certain Treatise, not long since published, a great Part of it printed in a Black-Letter, in Order to make it appear more authentick, and which has been afferted to contain nothing but what is Law, and if so, we are just where we were a hundred Years ago. This Book is called, The Doctrine of Libels, and in it are all the Star-Chamber Precedents, fortified with Abundance of modern Judgments, and this fent by the Direction of a Whig Administration, to prove, I suppose, that Power has a like Effect upon all Minds. At the Revolution fome Political Reasons were offered, why the Liberty of the Press should not be declar'd the Right of the Subject, tho' it was confessed to be so. But these Reasons subsist no longer, the Temper of the Nation is chang'd, and I dare say there is no body mad enough to believe, that Converts are to be made at this time of Day to facobitism by Dint of Reasoning. We ought therefore to be made safe and easy in this great Point, not by permitting Men to overturn the Principles of Morality and Religion, or of Duty and Submission to the Government by sophistical Writings, but by settling a plain Road in which Folks may walk without Fear; but to fay that we are a free People, and yet to deny us the Liberty of Speaking, when we think that Freedom in Danger, is a Sort of Craft that will no longer go down, nay, is a Sort of Craft, useless to those by whom it is employed, for Profecutions only hinder the timorous or referv'd from writing, and there are always Men enough of another Cast, who will venture the Publication of their Thoughts, in spight of any Risque they run. It is therefore better for the Prince and People, that we should be no longer in the Dark in a Matter of fuch Importance, but that the Way should be left open, of informing the Nation, their Representatives, and the Crown, of any Grievances that are either felt or fuspected, because this is the only way to have them examined and removed. To punish Men for complaining when they are injured, is unnatural as well as unjust, and and to make them smart for being in the Vapours, considering our Clime and Constitution, is somewhat severe. There are several kinds of Writings, which are declar'd criminal by Statute, let these remain so; but as to other Writings, let us not be any longer left to the fuggle of a fury's finding the Publication, and a Court's inferring the rest; but let the Case of Libels, like that of extraordinary Treasons, be left to the fudgment of Parliament only, and then we shall be sure that nothing really Dangerous will escape with Impunity, and that nothing will be punished, contrary to, or beyond its Deserts.

If what I have already faid, be not sufficient to shew the Necessity of establishing the Liberty of the Press, I have something to add that will. The Case of the Stage is recent; we all know what was pleaded in Favour of its Restraint; we all know what was said against it; and what Consequences it was said would follow, if that Restraint took Place. We have seen these Predictions strictly and literally suffilled, Wit and Humour are no more; we have lost one great Characteristick of a free People, let us not lose another too, lest Sense and Reason should follow the Track of Humour and Wit, and the British Genius be reduced to the French, Spanish and Italian Employments, of spinning out new Systems in Philosophy, or labouring bouring in Defence of Tyranny and Superflition. The Reader will easily perceive that this Argument might have been put in a much stronger Light, but the Arts of fine Writing are unnecessary in a fair Cause;

I do not labour to serve the Purposes of a Party, but to procure a just Measure of Safety and Security for the Commons of Great-Britain, that we may not at every Turn be exposed to short and sharp Struggles to secure our Liberties, or be obliged to go thro' the Drudgery of twenty Years Opposition at the Expence of the Wealth and Spirits of the Nation, without having the Satisfaction of knowing at the End that we need never undergo this Fatigue again.

The next thing I am to take Notice of is Elections, on the Freedom of which, as the Right Hon. the Speaker of the House of Commons, on a late solemn Occasion told the Nation, their Freedom depends. Hitherto have been enacted Laws upon Laws, which as yet have had no Estect. It is notorious to all the World, that Numbers of People pretend to undertake and manage Elections, it is become a Trade, and there are People not ashamed of acting as Borough-Brokers, which is in plain Terms saying, that they live or would live by selling their Country. It is as well known, that Abandance of Arts are used to keep Places in a thorough and constant Dependance.

dance, fo that the Persons they send to Parliament, are not so properly their Representatives, as the Agents of such as have them in their Power. A due Sense of this has made many People think, that the Form of our Constitution ought to be altered, at least in this Point. I confess that in my Opinion, this should be the last Remedy, because in every Corporation there is a Succession, and I think it hard that Posterity should be deprived of their Rights, thro' the Corruption of the present Times. But if another Remedy is to be applied, we must appear to be in earnest, and the People must be convinced, that the Intent of the Legislature is to extirpate the pernicious Practice of influencing the Minds of the Electors, by any Method whatsoever. If the least Indulgence be shewn to one Party, it will certainly afford a Handle to the Other; and therefore the furest way of curing this Evil, is to strike at all the Methods of influencing yet known, by providing, that if there be any Expence at Elections, the Electors and not the Candidates should bear it; as also that Members should purge themselves of all Suspicion of Corruption, as they do of Difloyalty and Popish Principles, when they take their Seats. I am fenfible that I go too far, and therefore I will stop short, but I hope the Honesty of my Intention will attone for Do any any unguarded Expression; and that my Zeal for the Honour of Parliament will excufe my speaking so plainly on so nice a Subject, the rather, because Doctrines of a different kind have been artfully and industriously spread among the People, where-by their Notions, as to this Point, have been so unsettled, that they have come to consider Elections in every Light, but that in which alone they ought to be considered. The time I hope is come when these Delusions will be exposed, and the Commons of Great-Britain will be brought to apprehend, that the most solemn, facred, and important Action of their whole Lives is giving their Votes at an Election, and that therefore they ought to come prepared in another Manner, than that which has been for many Years too common; for till this is brought about, the End never can be answered. People hot, and scarce in their Senses, are not likely to act upon Principles, and all Laws must needs be ineffectual among fuch as have no Consciences. Unfashionable Language this, but fit and proper, because I combat a fashionable Folly, which has induced even Persons of Rank, of Parts and of Probity to believe, that Men heated with Liquor, or drunk with Paffion or Prejudice, are in a Condition good enough to give their Votes, where their own and their Country's Safety Rands immediately stely concerned, whether more to our Shame, or to our Detriment as a Nation, would be a Point hard to determine.

The Place-Bill is another Matter of infinite Consequence, and indeed, when the People are so willing to be restrained from doing themselves Mischiefs in their Elections, it feems to be but a reasonable Request, that they should be secured as far as may be in their Members, by a Provision that too many of them may not have more to do than is confistent with the Service they owe their Country. I own, that on the other Side, abundance of plaufible Things may be faid upon this Head, more I think than upon any other; and yet when we examine them to the bottom, we find that most of these are Arguments, founded in Authority rather than Reason; instead therefore of answering fuch, I shall offer a few short, but cogent Motives for the passing of this Law, and leave them to the Confideration of the Reader.

In the first Place, such a Law seems to be necessary to prevent abundance of Abfurdities, for while Place-Men have Seets in the House, it frequently happens that a Servant sits as Judge upon his Masser; an Officer decides on the Obedience which the military Power owes to the civil Massistrate, and People obey in one Capacity what they are said to direct in another. It is impossible possible not to discern at first Sight that these are Incongruities, which Disorder the Frame, and very possibly may sometime or other affect the very Being of our Constitution. It is therefore extremely sit they should be removed, as in some Cases it has been confessed, and a Remedy applied, and by what Rule those that remain were distinguished from the rest, is, I think, hitherto untaught us by any of our professed Politicians.

The Mischief complained of is a Novelty, notwithstanding all that has been said of the Respect paid to the Crown in former Times. If we consider the Parliaments before the Restoration, we shall find but a Handful of Place-Men in them, and even those Place-Men such as we do not defire should be deprived of Seats. The multiplying of Places began after the Revolution, when instead of the great Officers of the Crown, we came to have Business done by Colleges or Boards, which fome penetrating People have thought a Change neither honourable nor beneficial, for when a Treasurer or an Admiral did any Thing amis, the Error was easily traced to its Author, and the Commons knew how, and from whom, to obtain Satisfaction; but the Thing is quite otherwise now, to discover where the Blame lies is not fo easy, and to fix a Charge upon any particular Perfon, is almost impracticable.

cable. One fees therefore that in this Light there can be nothing more reasonable, than to recur to our first Principles, and bring Things back to their antient Standard, that our Parliaments like the Parliaments of old, may be the Support of the Crown, and the Refuge of the People.

Add to all this, that fince the Method of bestowing of Places on the Members of the House of Commons, first came in Use, it has been a growing Evil, and tho' it be true, that there is a legal Provision against their possessing any late created Offices, yet it has been evident enough, that for a long Series of Time past, every Year has produced new Places, which by the Help of proper Changes, have been converted into Gratifications. The best Way therefore to give a Check to this Grievance, and to spare that mighty Effusion of Public Money, which has been squandered on unprofitable Servants, is to lessen the Number of Place Men in the House of Commons, for it will be found that when Men have no Places, nor can have them, they will be less ready to create them for other People. One might add Abundance of Things to strengthen this Argument, but that they are for many Reasons unnecessary, especially for this, that every Reader, who will take the Trouble of weighing Matters feriously with himself, will discover so many Wavs of applying what has been 3 been already faid, that there will be no Danger of his not apprehending a PLACE-BILL the most effectual Remedy for creating burdensome and unnecessary Offices, perhaps a proper Introduction to the suppressing many, with which we are loaded already.

It is likewise plain that Persons bave not Time to perform fuitably, and fuccessfully, what is required of them in double Capacities. A Man cannot be in two Places at once, which feems to be a good Reason why he should not take upon him Characters that interfere with each other; and which confequently put him under an absolute Necessity of neglecting one, if not both. The Service of the House is in a Manner certain, both as to Time and Place, with what Propriety then can a Man accept a Post, which he knows may, nay probably will, require his Attendance at the same time in some other Place? We have been told by fuch as defend this Practice, that Placemen are the People's Servants; it is not therefore eafy to understand, how a Man that takes upon him to represent his Country in Parliament, can reconcile to himself taking Wages from his Country, for other Services which he does not perform; or if he earns his Wages, how he can be fatisfied as to the Safety of his Country, which at any time may, and very frequently has depended upon a fingle Vete. In this Respect too the Conduct of Senators has a great Influence on the People, they feldom scruple to follow their Examples; and for this Reason the greatest Care should be taken not to misslead them into a Notion, that the public Money may be innocently taken without earning, or the public Service neglected without a Crime: But if this be in the Nature of Things at all Times requisite, it is much more so in an Age like this, when it is but too evident that Men are very lax in their Notions, and are willing to lay hold even of the slightest Pretences to excuse themselves from a strict Performance of their Duty.

I beg leave to subjoin one other Motive, which will perhaps appear more conclusive than the rest; I mean the Authority of several great and glorious Patriots, who have maintained this Doctrine for many Years past, and, who without doubt are fixed in this Opinion still. Should we suppose them capable of altering it, such Confequences would follow as I abhor the Thoughts of; we should be then at a Loss how to know certainly what is right or or wrong; we should begin to doubt of our past Conduct and theirs, at least we should find it very difficult to satisfy ourselves, whether they were right before or are so now, which might prove prejudicial to them and to ourselves. But the Supposition is groundless, and to insist upon it would be indecent, we may rest satisfied that such as have heretosore supported the Place-Bill, against all the Insluence of Power, will now use all their Power to secure the passing of the Place-Bill, in Case any Arts should be practised or Opposition formed to prevent it. This to be sure will give the People the highest Satisfaction, and bring them for once to believe that Places cannot alter Patriots, but that Men truly attached to the Service of their Country are the same in Public, as in private Stations, and incapable of being biassed in either.

A more favourable Juncture than this there cannot be for the passing such a Law. The Expedience, the Necessity of it have so lately appeared, that no Imputation can be fixed on the the Earnestness with which People expect it; as on the other hand, the Reputation of some who have lately acquired Places is so perfectly unblemished, that the Demand of it can be no Reflection upon their Administration; but on the other fide, if we should be now deceived in our Hopes, if by any Accident, any Overfight, this Bill should be lost (I suppose the Thing only, for it can never happen) we must for ever despair, so fair an Opportunity we can hardly imagine will ever be had again, and of a fairer we can form no Idea. I take it then for granted, that the best Law that can be contrived trived for this Purpose will speedily be given us, that all our Fears and Apprehensions in this respect will be quite taken away, that national Councils being freed from this dead Weight, will act with more Dignity, as well as greater Alacrity, and that the People in consideration of so great a Blessing, will address themselves with the utmost Ardour to the Service of the Publick, esteeming nothing a Hardship, that an Independant Parliament shall think sit to impose upon them, for restoring the Reputation of Britain, the long lost Balance of Power, and the Freedom of Europe, all of which might otherwise have been thought desperate.

The Restoration of triennial Parliaments is another thing which the People cannot but expect, because they must be perfectly fatisfied that they cannot be fafe or free without it. This has been so strongly proved to them, and afferted by Persons of fuch Weight and Character, that it never can depart from their Thoughts till it be accomplished, in FaEt till they are restored to one of the greatest Blessings they derived from the Revolution, and which when it was taken from them, was taken by Surprise, was taken as an Expedient to serve a pressing Occasion, for nothing could have brought them to endure Septennial Parliaments, but the Apprehension of another E_2 thorough thorough Change in the State, which very possibly might have ended in their having no Parliament at all. To dwell ever so little even on the most important Arguments which have been offered, to shew the Necessity of restoring this salutary Law, would take up a whole Treatise, and surely to very little Purpose, considering that the People are already convinced, and that they in some Measure owe that Conviction to the Reasonings of Persons in Power on this Subject. I shall content, myself therefore, with hinting a few things that seem to shew it ought not to be delayed or postponed.

It feems to be not a little odd to call a Parliament, the Nation's Representative, and yet to continue them by Law beyond that Period, for which the People incline to chuse them. One may venture to say, that there is not a County, a City, or a Borough throughout Great Britain, where the Electors have not shewn a Dislike to Septemial Parliaments, and a Desire to have their Old Rights return again into their Hands. Neither ought this to be stilled a fond and factious, but rather a just and natural Desire, for as Princes do not readily bear with Encroachments on Prerogative, so it cannot be supposed that the People will tamely submit to any Diminution of their Freedom, especially when they consider the bad Consequences that have, and the much more dangerous Consequences that may attend it. Hence arises that universal Demand of the Repeal of the Septennial Act, and hence in my Judgment, arises the clearest and most cogent Argument that can be offer'd for it. The People for whose Benefit Government was instituted, the People of Great Britain, who long ago were allowed to have a Right to triennial Parliaments, this People who have experienced the Loss of that Right, unanimously wish and desire that they may enjoy it again; can there be any thing more sit, than that the wise and worthy Patriots of the present Age, should secure their Affections by granting them this Demand?

The Repeal of the Septennial Act, will be a natural Consequence of the Care taken to prevent Corruption in Elections, and the unreasonable Biass derived to Members from a Multitude of Places. When these Obstacles are removed, all the Pretences that ever were alledged in Favour of Septennial Parliaments will be taken away; for if Bribery and Confusion can be excluded at the Choice of Members, as furely they may, then there need be no Apprehension of the frequent Returns of Elections; they will be as peaceable, as it is to be hoped they are no less useful and necessary Assemblies, than Assizes and Quarter-Sessions; the Frequency of which which was never yet thought a Grievance. Farther still, if but a moderate Number of Placemen have Seats in the House, and if it be, as it has been often strongly afferted, a Hardship on Gentlemen to be render'd incapable of Publick Trusts, by the People's Choice of them for Representatives; then it is plain, that the only Way to remedy this Evil, is to restore triennial Parliaments; for an Incapacity of three Years, will be furely a less Mischief than an Incapacity for seven. Nay, by this Means, the People's Choice may recommend their Members to Places, without Prejudice to their Constituents; for when a Gentleman has ferved with Attention, Steadiness and Integrity, one or two Parliaments, the People ought not, nor will they grudge, if they see him all the rest of his Life in Office. But if on the other hands we consider an Election to Parliament, in the Light of an honourable, but burtbenfome Duty, in which it may be well confidered, then it must be confessed, that an Election for seven Years is a very great Hardship on Members; such a Hardship, as may very probably deter Men who are best qualified, from accepting the Office.

It must likewise occur to every Man of Resection, that till we have this Security, other Alterations will be of little Consequence. The Iniquity of private Persons bartering away their Votes may be prevented, the Power of the Crown in bestowing Places on Members of Parliament may be limited, but still the Inconveniences suspected, nay and felt too from fep-tennial Parliaments, will not be sufficiently provided against. The Continuance, the unnecessary Continuance, I was going to say, the unwilling Continuance of so great a Trust for so long a Time, is a thing justly to be feared. Corruption we know is as subtle and ingenious, as it is bold and enterprizing; if therefore we would fecure ourselves effectually against its Attempts on the Constitution, let us take away this powerful Temptation to it, for it is allowed, that when a Parliament is to last for three Years only, it cannot answer the Ends of Corruption, and must therefore in all probability escape it. It is true some Inconveniencies may attend the Repeal of the Septennial Act, tho' I must confess I do not foresee them; but if there should, it is time enough to think of them when they appear. There never was any System of human Contrivance absolutely free from Difficulties, and therefore if they should occur here, they ought not to discredit this Meafure more than any other, neither ought we to despair of finding Remedies for them. The Cale in Fael is this, that the Milchiefs attending another Situation, are too well known and too deeply experienced. This is the Cafe io in fact, I say, which demands our immediate Notice; and as to the Case in view, it must be allowed not the best alone, but the only Cure that can be thought of, even tho' it was exposed to some Inconveniency, therefore the People in general desire to have it applied.

As foon as these Regulations shall take Place, the Nation will be delivered from all rational Jealousies, as to the Sasety of the Constitution; Parliaments will be restor'd to that Reverence and Authority, which they had amongst our Ancestors; and which, from a Prospect of these Benefits, we already pay to the Parliament in Being; after this, private Men will no longer concern themselves, as they have done, in cavassing publick Affairs, but will return to the Care of their domestic Concerns, from a thorough Confidence, that all things relating to Government are in a right Channel. To this defirable Condition, may the Business of our State be brought by these few and eafy Amendments, which are render'd requisite through the Injuries done by Time and Accident to the Frame of our Government, which human Forefight perhaps could not prevent, but which human Industry may certainly remove, otherwife it would be in vain to enquire or talk about them. The Effects of these Disorders first made them the Subject of publick Discourse; and fince fince then the Remedies here mentioned, have been the Refult of every grand Consultation. If therefore Experience, Reason and Authority have any Weight, if what we know ourselves, or what we learn from History can afford us any Direction, then we have all the Reason in the World to hope, that by having a due Respect to the Freedom of Elections, by a just and moderate Restraint of Place - Men in the House of Commons, and by restoring the People to their Right of electing once in three Years a new Representative, we shall put an end to all the Fears and Fealoufies that have so long subsisted amongst us, establish our Liberty on a Foundation not to be shaken, and thereby fill the Pcople with those warm and vigorous Sentiments of Zeal for the Publick, which Liberty only can inspire.

There are indeed some other things which very nearly concern the Interest of the Publick, and which we can have no Doubt will be immediately taken Care of; I will mention a few. The publick Debts have been a long and Leavy Burthen on the People, a great Incitement to Luxury, or at least to Ideness, by providing a safe and certain Income for the most indolent, and consequently the most useless Part of Society, and a great Discouragement to Industry and Trade, because this Income of theirs arises from the Labour of others. Yet long and heavy as this Burthen is, I own it to be, and I hope it will be always thought, a just and necessary Burthen, till such time as we are able to pay it. But the Mifchief is, that some Arts have been used to persuade us, that paying of it is a thing that will not be foon thought of, nor have Endeavours been wanting on the other Hand to possess us with an Opinion, that perhaps a quick Payment thereof may not be our Interest. No Wonder then, while such odd Suggestions were flying about, that the People might be much difturbed in their Minds with Apprehensions on this Subject, especially when they heard those who could agree in nothing else clear in this, that it was a Matter of great Perplexity, and of which, Folks of ordinary Understanding could not be Judges. A little Confideration might possibly convince them of the Truth of this last Affertion, in respect to the Circumstances of paying the National Debt; but as to the two great Points of its not being the Interest of the Government or the People, to fet still patiently under this Load, they could not possibly be under any Doubts about them.

For first in respect to the Government. It would be impossible to impose it on Men of common Sense, though altogether unacquainted with Funds, that a wife and well-well-meaning Administration should think it their Interest to keep the Nation under fuch a Load of Debt, without ever thinking of Means to relieve it. The barely fuggesting this, would sufficiently imply, that the Government had a different Interest from the Pcople; and that therefore they were content to let such a Load rest upon them, that they might render them the more tractable and easy to be managed. To speak the Truth, and why should we conceal it? this was the very Reason offered to support so strange a Paradox in Politicks. But tho' it might be a *Rea*fon which some Men would chuse to act on, it was fuch a Reason, as the wickedst Ministry we ever had durst never avow. It was a Reason that fully proved a good Government never could have any Intention of continuing the Burthen of Publick Debts, longer than it was absolutely necessary, because such a Government would expect not the Service only, but the Affections of the People. In short, this Maxim might do well enough amongst Slaves, or might suit the Intentions of Men who jought to make Slaves, but could never enter the Hearts of any who inclined to leave their Countrymen free.

Then as to the Interest of the Nation it was impossible, let the Subject be ever so mysterious, that any Sophism should be-

get a Doubt, whether we were not the worse for owing a vast Debt, and paying a large Interest sor it. The plausible Pretence that this inclined Foreigners to trust their Money here, so that we were really the richer for what we owed, might confole us a little while, which we are obliged to be in Debt, but could never satisfy us that we were the better for it, or that we should be less Wealthy for owing nothing. It is very true, that Men well acquainted with Figures, having different Apprehenfions of fome Things, from what others have who are less versed in Numbers, but does it follow from thence that any Skill in Accounts can bring a Man to believe that a Dcht is no Burden, if so I would beldly pronounce such a Skill to be of no Use? But the contrary is true, such as understand Figures best, see this Matter in quite another Light, and have enabled us to show the Fallacy of that Argument, even to the most ordinary Understanding. If Foreigners trust us with their Money, it must be because they can make more of it here than they can at home, and if so, then we have just Reason to apprehend that we pay more for their Money than it is worth, or to speak in softer Terms more than we can afford, the End of which must be beggaring ourselves and cheating them, for we can only pay them Interest fo fo long as our Money lasts, and when they come to lose the Principle, they will think themselves hardly dealt with, whatever the Interest may be which they have received. To make this plainer and put the thing out of Dispute. We know that the Dutch are great Proprietors in our publick Funds. But the Dutch are a trading Nation, a Nation careful of their Interest, and who are well known feldom to make a rash, hardly ever a wrong Judgment, in Affairs of this Sort. We must therefore conclude that they confider this Method of employing their Money as a Kind of Trade, and all Circumstances, all Hazards considered, a beneficial Kind of Trade, otherwise they would not employ fuch large Sums therein. But if it be advantageous to them, how can it be so to us? their Profit must arise from drawing more from our Funds, than they could do from their own Commerce, but we know that our Trade is not driven at so small an Expence, or with such high Advantages as the Dutch, and therefore we may be fatisfied if we will be fatisfied of any thing that they gain, and we loje by this Confidence which they repose in us. We may apply this Reasoning to other Cases, and be from thence convinced that the public Debt is a real, not an imaginary Grievance, tho', as I said before, it is a Burden that must be taken off by Degrees, and not thrown down in a Pett, tho' it may be troublesome to bear.

But it may be objected, if the Cafe be so clear, how comes it to pass that so many able Men, who feem to have understood this Subject, have been of a different Opinion, or what Reason is there to suppose that you are more infallible than they? To this I think I can give a very fatisfactory Answer. The national Debt is swollen to fo immense a Bulk, that a very consider-eble Part of the Nation, are so far interested therein, as to desire that it should not be esteemed a Burden, or at least not so great a Burden as it really is. Now among these People there are many who are Men of great Skill in Figures and in Arguments; and therefore we need not wonder that they employ their Skill, as most People do, for the Furtherance of their porticular Interest, without having a due Respect to that of the Publick. We know what an Outcry was made against the Scheme of that truly difinterested Patriot, Sir John BARNARD, and yet there is nothing clearer, nothing more certain, than that this was an Outcry of Part of the Nation against the Whole, an Outcry made by fuch as were maintained by, or were raising Fortunes out of the publick Debt, against the Interest of the whole People of Great Britain, who bend under the Weight of it. This therefore folves the Difficulty, this shews how we are come to have a potent Party amongst us in Favour of the publick Debt, nay, it shews more, it shews us that if the public Debt should grow still greater than it is, the Party who are for it would grow stronger, and when this is maturely weighed, it will appear a very alarming Argument against the Continuance of such a Burden. But bleffed be God, we have the Profpect of an immediate Remedy, I mean the Bill lately brought into Parliament for appointing Commissioners to state the publick Debts, this shews a true Spirit of Patriotism, and is fufficient to convince us, that we shall at last see what the Circumstances of the Nation really are, and then perhaps it will not be so difficult a Matter, even for private Men, to contrive a Method for a just, speedy, and effectual Removal of this grievous Load; but I have dwelt too long upon this Point, and must therefore be the shorter upon Others.

The regulating of our Taxes would be a Work of great Utility to the Publick, for next to taking them off it is certain, there could be no greater Ease given to the Subject than laying them equally, fince there can be no just Reason assigned, why one part of his Majesty's Subjects should bear more in this Respect than another. Every Body

Body knows the Hardships that attend the Window Tax, which is so contrived, that it affects an industrious Weaver more than the richest Peer. There are abundance of Inconveniencies in the Management of the Excise, more in the Customs, but most of all in the Land-Tax, which, tho' it might be the fairest, is, and ever has been, the hardest and most unequal Tax that is levied upon the People, fince at the same time that four Shillings in the Pound is paid to the full in London, the Inhabitants of the North and West do not pay above one, or between one and two at most. If this Mischief was taken away, a Land-Tax of two Shillings would produce as much as four does now, which, tho' it would be the fame thing to the Publick, yet it is plain that kalf the private People would be relieved who pay this Tax, and the other half could not juilly complain, fince they would then pay no more than they ought.

It would be also a very commendable as well as acceptable Work, to regulate the Laws relating to the Poor, so that they might be maintained like Englishmen and Christians, yet with such Occonomy, that paying for their Maintenance, might not contribute to bring others into their Condition. Something to this Purpose was talked of in the first Session of the last Parliament, and if I mistake not, the Heads of a Bill were drawn up, whereby the feveral Affi-relating to this Matter, would have been reduced to one general Law; but as I obferved this was in the fir/t Seffions, and nothing more was heard of it to the left which certainly was but too generally remarked by the People, who expect to feet the Hands of their Representatives, in aifing as well as imposing Burthens, Nov would it be an improper Addition to this Care, if some Methods were taken for preventing the Increase of our Poor, by restraining such iniquitous Professions, as have a vilible Tendency to multiply Beggar, fucls as Pawn-Brokers, Tally-Men, Tipling-Houses, Geneva-Shops, and all other Receptacles of idle and debauched Perform, which have been carried on for many Years part, with fuch shameless, or rather shameful Impunity, that Foreigners, from a View of our Corruption, might doubt whether we had any Government at all. I hope it will not be thought a Crime in me to mention, on fuch an Occasion as this, what our Grand Yuries have so often, tho' to so little Purpote complained of, when things are not reached by ordinary Courts, which yet are highly detrimental to the Publick, the Parliament is the fole Refource of the Prople, and to it every Man may refort.

The Repeal of obfolete or ufcloss pena: Laws, would be an Ast of great Julius in itself, and of much Benefit to the People. It is notorious that these are now multiplied to such a Degree, as that it would require Volumes to comprehend them. Some are arbitrary, some contradictory, and numbers of them unreasonable which is the Confe that many are fonable, which is the Cause that many remain unexecuted, tho' in fome Respect this too may prove detrimental to the Peo-ple, fince in many Cases it is equally unreasonable to punish beyond Measure, or abfolutely to pass by an Offence. One great Source of these Evils has been a modern Principle, of adverting rather to the Interest of the Revenue than the Service of the Nation; whence it has come to pass, that Laws have been exerted or suffered to fleet at the Discretion of Officers, which is a thing entirely repugnant to our Constitution, this making Laws the Masters of Men, and that giving to Men a Power over the Laws. One cannot imagine that such a Regulation as this should be instantaneous; no, as Mischies discover themselves gradually, so there must be time taken to root them out; but if the great Council of the Nation, would have the Condescension to appoint a Committee to enquire into the Number, Nature and Consequences of the penal Laws, it would give us Hopes, that in fome reasonable Space, they would be digested into such Order, as might render them 2

them no longer terrible, but falutary to the Subject, which certainly would be a great and happy Change.

There is indeed one of these Laws, which deferves to be particularly mentioned, because it is among the Number of the reputed Causes of our intestine Divisions. The Law I mean is the Test Act, for the repealing of which several fruitless Attempts have been made, and tho' no body would be better pleased to see it repealed than I, yet I own that I am very well pleased they were fruitless. The known Motive to these Attempts, was the Dispute subfifting between the late Ministry and the Opposition; and if in such a Situation of Things, the Repeal of the Test Act had been carried, it might have revived our religious Jars, and been the Means of perpetuating Dissertions. But those Times are now over; Men are restored to the free Use of their Reason, in publick as well as private Capacities, and therefore this furely is the fittest Time for removing such a flumbling Block of Offence, and for restoring to us as Christians that Liberty, which seems to be the Birth-Right of Britons. This is fo just, so equitable, so rational a Demand, that it stands not in Need of Party Assistance, as on the other Hand we have now just Grounds to hope, it will never more be opposed through Party Influence. The G 2 ReaReasons in Favour of this Step have been to often to unanswerably stated, that it might well be dispensed with, if in so short a Tract as this, I took them for granted; but as I have put the Matter upon a fair Islue, and entirely disengaged it from Party, I think it may not be amis to offer a few Arguments in support of my Assertion, that che Parties ought to think this Measure right.

In the first Place, such a Distinction as this AT makes, is contrary to natural and to Gospel Liberty, and is of the Nature of those Impoattions, which have the worst Effect on the Minds of Men. It occasions an idle and needless Distinction, between their civil and religious Interests; leads to Hypocrify, Indifference, Want of Confideration, Contempt of Divine Things, and fo to downright Atheilm. For when once Men have got over Deabts, they come to leaping over Princi-Mer, as woeful Experience has convinced us; for the more Ocths, the more Decla-cations, the more Subjeriptions have been required amongst us, the less we have of Conscience and Christianity, and the more Libertini/n has prevailed. It is plain, therefore, that upon this Topic, Believers and Unbelievers must agree; recording to the Notions of the former, it must be held a dishonourable Distinction; and on the Principle profesical by the latter, it appears to be Pretence is, that the Test is the Bulwark of the Church; but sure no Man who is a Christian indeed, thinks that the Church of God will be endangered, by ruining any of the Fortifications Men have raised in its Desence. This is both an impious and a senseles Position when strictly considered, however plausible it may seem, when dressed out by Masters of Logic and Rhetoric, who are able to give an Absurdity the Colour of Truth, and raise an enthusiastic Spirit of Violence, in support of any Cause.

Next, I fay, that fincere and conscientious Churchmen have given this up long ago; they are thoroughly convinced, as indeed every confiderate Man must be, that the Test AET is a Civil Establishment, whereby a divine Institution is perverted to a prophane Use, which must affect every bonest, every pious Mind with deep Concern; the rather, becanfe it is evident, that instead of reconciling Diffenters to the Church, this is a great Cause why many are Diffenters still, who scruple Compliance when enjoined, and yet would have no Doubts about it, if it were not so. The truest Friends to the Church, are certainly fuch as are attached to it, from an attentive Confideration of its Principles, and a fincere Perfuafrom that they are agreeable to the Will of God; but these Men are as much offended with the Test AEt as the Dissenters, delire as much to fee it repealed, and think their own Deliverance from the Sin and Shame of profituting the bleffed Sacrament, would be as great as theirs. The Pretence therefore that the Repeal of this Law would prejudice the Church, if we take that Word in its spiritual and proper Sense, is not only idle and vain, but also absolutely repugnant to Truth. The Church of England, as a Society of Christians, have no Interest in the Telt Act; on the contrary, they really are, and many have confessed as much under Obligations to get this Scandal speedily removed. But it may be faid, that the Church is to be confidered not only as a Christian, but an established Church, and therefore entitled to defend its religious Rights, by the Means thought most proper by the Civil-Power. This is the last Resource, and to this I think two very satisfactory Answers may be given; fatisfactory I mean to fuch as incline to be satisfied; for as to Men who dispute with a settled Purpose of never parting with their own Opinions, it is a vain thing to talk of fatisfying or convincing them. But to the Point,

First, tho' it be allowed that an established Church may use the Means prescribed by Civil Authority for its Desence, yet this must be in things lawful upon Christian Stian Principles, and the Method prescribed by the Test Act, is acknowledged not to be of this Number, even by fuch as are zealous for preferving it; and who, therefore, according to their own Arguments, ought rather to think of a proper Equivalent, than absolutely persist in demanding as they do its Continuance. But secondly, this is not all, the diffenters are politically within the Construction of this Ast, yet it is certainly against the Spirit of it, to put them under its Penalties. The Fact is notorious that the Intent of the Legislature, in making this Law, was to fecure the Protestant Religion, and therefore to turn the Edge of it upon Protestants, is a thing very irreconcileable to that Spirit of Meskness and Sincerity, which is effential to true Religion. I would therefore propose it as a fair Question, to the Advocates for the Continuance of this Law, whether such a Proceeding does not argue an Attachment rather to a political than ecclefiastical Establishment; and whether it is not betraying the Christian, or at least the Protestant Religion to its capital Enemies, for the fake of Interest, thus to postpone Principles. I would not be understood to argue either against the established Church, or in Favour of Sectaries, farther than is necessary to their Toleration; but fince I think it is clear that the Test is a Hardship on the Lav-DillenDifference, and on the Clergy of the Church of England, I must also think it ought to be taken away for the Ease and by the Confent of both, such an equivalent Security being first agreed on, as may answer the end of the Test by some lawful Means.

The Care of our Manufactures is a Point not to be paffed over; to say the Truth, it is a Point that will admit of no Delay. Our Negligence in this Respect has been tod great already; and most evident it is, that we fuffer by it grievously, and must continue to fuffer by it more and more, till it is thoroughly tearched into and effectually redressed. Tho' it must be allowed, that Complaints for Want of Money have been common in all Ages, yet it cannot be denied, that at prefent they are remarkably just There is a real Stagnation of Trade, which to too sensibly felt to be disputed, our stander, and Numbers of People, who were wont to get their Bread by their Labour, now expect Alms. Such a Change as this is not only prejudicial, but scandalous to a Nation, becaute it is an evident Proof that we have neglected our Affair:, and have made little or no Use of the mighty Advantages afforded us by Providence. It is therefore high time to look about us, if we are concerned either for our Honour or for our Interest; Petitions about Peritions come from all the Place.

Places where Trade was wont to flourish, complaining of its Decay, and of the Difcouragements it labours under. Neither does the Malady stop here, but like a Gangrene, spreads from the trading to the landed Interest, makes our Rents fall, and all Property precarious. If therefore we continue to turn a deaf Ear to all the Remonstrances made upon this Subject, or to behave towards them with fuch Indifference, as if they were Things that might be looked into at any time; we shall be like Men of large Fortunes and larger Expences, who trouble not themselves about Debts or Incumbrances, till their Estates are so affected thereby, that Care comes too late, and Oeco-nomy is to no Purpose.

The Affair of Wool, and Woollen Manufactures, has been for many Years canvaffed in general Discourse, and has now and then occupied the Attention of a great Assembly for a little while; I wish it was absurd to say, and to little Purpole. By this fort of Management the thing is now grown so perplexed, and at the fame time concerns us so nearly, that we are at a loss what Course to take, and yet almost any would be preferable to taking no Course at all. In fuch a Case, Circumspection, Labour and Attention are necessary; the thing must be examined into by proper Judges; Enquiries must be made in a pro-H per Manner of, and by proper Persons; Stories must not be taken upon Trust, or Projects received in Virtue rather of Recommendations than Reajons. All Mens Opinions should be asked, and such as appear most rational should be followed. All this can-not be dispatched by a few Hours Attendance twice in a Week for a Month together; no, it will require a cooler and more confiderate Method, that is to fay, if despifing Expedients, we resolve to settle the Matter on a right Foundation, to preserve our Wool at kome, to provide for its being manufactured here and vended abroad, as heretofore was wont and may be again, if we are not wanting to ourselves, which has been too often our Misfortune.

It may also deserve Enquiry how far the Exportation of raw Commodities, the Increase or Improvement of Manusactures already set up, or the establishing new Ones, may be promoted by the Assistance of the of the Legislature, and in what Cases it is better to leave things open, that every Man may act as Occasion directs; for it is certain, that as in some Respects the Want of legal Provisions have been sound detrimental, so in others, Restraints of this sort have been no less prejudicial. The Nature and present Circumstances of corporate Bodies of Tradesmen, undoubtedly merit Inspection; for as the due Use of Charters obtained from the Crown, are of the utmost Benefit to the Subject, fo all Abuses of them are both flagrant and extensive Grievances. The Power of levying Fines, raising Quarterages and other Impolitions, without being subject to Examination, or Account to the Body of People upon whom fuch Sums are levied, is very unjust and unreasonable Power, which ought to be taken away. The same kind of arbitrary Authority is apparently as ill-founded, tho' fometimes supported by modern Constructions of Law, by which Parishes are often burthened with the Expence of Suits, determined to their own Prejudice, and are forced to pay for the Establishment of a tyrannical Government, which though they know not how to shake off, they know as little how to bear with Patience. Commissions by Direction of Parliament for reviewing these Things, for enforcing Authority where it is for general Benefit, and for refloring Liberty, where Power has been illegally obtained, grown injurious in process of Time and Change of Circumstances, or unwarrantably extended, would be of great Utility, inafinuch as it would manifest the Attention of our Superiors, reprefs the Violence and Injustice of ambitious and avaritious Men, and relieve the common fort, who by their Labour and Industry are the most useful Members of Society, from fuch Oppressions as at pre-H 2

from

fent four their Minds, and dispirit them in the Exercise of their Employments. Such Commissions would also prove Sources of useful Intelligence to the State, and enable us to apply to better Purposes, considerable Sums which are now spent in luxurious Gluttony, or diverted into private Pockets, and which with much greater Justice might be converted to the Service of the Publick, if upon mature Deliberation it should be found expedient any longer to raise them at all.

The last thing I shall mention, is the Neceffity of enquiring into the past and present State of the great trading Companies, which in the Nature of Things have and must have a vast Influence, and are therefore capable of doing according as they use it, much Hurt, or much Good. These were all originally erected for the Encouragement of Trade; but how far of late Years especially they have been from answering that Purpose, how much they have contributed · to encourage a Spirit of Avarice and Stockjobbing, which is the Bane of beneficial Commerce; and what Opportunities they have given to bold Projectors and artful Mana-gers to engross the Wealth of the Nation, which is fure to be employed in a fcandalous Manner when it falls into fuch dirty Hands, is so well known, from the Remembrance we have of the South-Sea Scheme, the Harborough borough Lottery, and the Charitable Corporation, that the Usefulness of such an Enquiry cannot be doubted or denied. It is certainly of the utmost ill Consequence to fee in a Country, which in a manner subsists by Trade, numbers of People grow rich by the Management of other Men's Money Concerns, or raising Fortunes by the Direction of a Company's Affairs, while their Traffick so managed, is detrimental to the Proprietors. Neither is it honourable in respect to the Government, under which we live, that private Men should perfectly know and be thoroughly convinced, that fuch iniquitous Things are practifed, at the same time that the Publick receives no Satisfaction, while the Guilty live in Affluence and Credit; nay, perhaps are trusted with Posts of high Importance, instead of being punished. Such things not only aftonish but corrupt the Minds of the People, who, following the Example of those they are taught to call their Betters, have Recourse to Shifts and Artifices, in order to raile a Fortune, instead of pursuing as they were wont, the plain Path to Riches and Reputation, by an honest Endeavour to promote their own and the Nation's Welfare, in the known Methods of Cultivation and Exporta-tion of what grows, or is manufactured at home. Hence the mighty Difference between the present and former times; the In-

Incertainty of so many People's Properties, and the Readiness which is shewn in embarking in Lotteries and other such like Designs, which flatter the prevailing Views of attaining large Fortunes quickly, and without Astivity, which Humour was formerly the Ruin of the Common-Wealth of Genea, and is at present become very formidable in Holland, though far short in the Mischiefs it does there, of what it produces here. Let therefore our Companies be restrained to things within the Compass of their Charters, let it be made manifest that they perform these, and let such Branches of Business as they have undertaken, and do not perform, be left to the Management of others, who by skilful Methods of employing their private Fortunes, would increase their own Estates, and do signal Service to the Publick.

In drawing up this succinct Review of the principal Things expected by the People from the present Administration; I can safely aver, that I have acted under no other Influence than that of public Spirit. In Respect to my Situation in Life I am as much below Hope as I am above Fear. I have no Intention to flatter any Man or any Set of Men on the Acquisition of Power, nor have I any particular Reason to be afraid of the Use which they may make of it. I thought a short Discourse of this kind

Kind, might at this Juncture be useful and necessary; useful to refresh the Memories of the Great, as to their Promises before they were so; and necessary to the People that they might insist on just and rational Demands, and not to be duped into such Requests as might afford a Colour of Justice to their Refusal. How I have executed my Design it will be the Reader's Task to determine, it is sufficient for me that I meant honestly, that I have acted impartially, that I have slandered no Man.

Should the Question be asked how I come to know that thefe are the Claims, or Wishes of the Commons of Great Britain? I think myself bound to give a fair and ingenuous Answer. I have heard Men of all Ranks, as well in promiscuous Companies as in private Conversations, insist often upon most and sometimes upon all of these Topicks. as things which would give them entire Satisfaction. I have collected the fame thing from the most fensible and applauded Papers written to promote the Country Interest, I find many of these Points recommended to the Confiderations of Members by their Contituents. I am well affured that many wife Men and worthy Patriots, who are now in the Administration, have on proper Occasions declared for these Demands, and I have heard and believe that they profess themselves to be in the lame fame Sentiments still. All which taken together have convinced me that these are things certainly and ardently wished for by the Commons of Great Britain, as necessary to their Safety and Security, which would afford them immediate Ease, and be productive of future Happiness; under which Persuasion I have thus collected and put them together in the best Dress I could, which tho' it may not be fit for them to wear, is all that my Wardrobe could furnish; and if any Man dislikes them therein, let him array them as much better as he pleases, he cannot give himself more Pleasure than he will give me, all my Concern is that they meet with a good Reception, in Order to which I would be content to be their meanest Attendant, rather than Master of the Ceremonies, to which I know myself unequal.

There are however some other Reasons which induce me to lay hold of this Opportunity, and which I shall very willingly confess. The first of these was the Indignation I conceived, at hearing some Mentalk, as if the driving certain Persons from their Posts had answered all the Ends of the Nation, and that our Condition was absolutely altered in Consequence of the Names of the great Officers of State being differently spelt from what they were before. Alas! what is this to the People, what what imports it to many bundred thousand Persons who occupies this Employment, or discharges that Office? It is the Prerogative of the Crown to appoint and remove Minifters, a Prerogative I hope we shall never fee invaded, but the great Concern of the People is Freedom and the Security of that Constitution by which they enjoy it. For this they were anxious, exceedingly anxious not long ago, and for this they must be anxious still, till fuch Steps are taken, such Alterations made, and fuch Rules established, as may free them from all Fears, and make the Return of a corrupt Influence impossible. To endeavour to talk the People out of these Hopes, to discourage such Expectations, to infinuate that Things may be safely postponed, is doing the utmost Mischief, and therefore I cannot imagine that any body will have the Assurance to address themselves in this Strain to the Publick. In case they should, I have been too quick for them; in plain Terms, and in a narrow Compass, I have laid down the Nature of the People's Claims, and faid fomewhat of the Reafons on which they are founded; the Witter therefore that undertakes an opposite Task, must disprove the one and refute the other, or he will gain no great Credit by his Performance. Mistakes I have been doubtless liable to, but upon the whole, I dare fay mine is the People's Plan, not calculated to ferve the narrow Purposes of Party, but built as the Phrase is among the genuine Patriots upon a broad Bottom.

Another Reason which moved me to this Publication, was the convincing fuch as are true Friends to their Country, that the Mischiefs we labour under are not feigned or chimerical, but true and real; yet fuch as may and ought to be cured; this I thought was the best Proof of the Falshood of that Calumny, which has fo boldly imputed modern Patriotism to a Spirit of Disaffection. There is certainly a wide Difference between Difloyalty and Discontent; the Love of our Prince does not take from us a Sense of our Misfortunes, neither does it imply any Obligations to conceal them, because by weakening ourselves we injure HIM, nor is it possible that the Kingdom should be distressed, and the King remain unaffected. It is therefore the Effects of Duty, when the People make known their Griefs in a legal Way, they then make use of their great Privilege as free Subjects, and flow their Defire of ferving the Crown, by expressing an Expectation of being put into a Condition to ferve it, by the removal of fuch Incumbrances as difable them for the present.

It has therefore been the Policy of the best Reigns, for the Government to shew a greater Concern for the People, than for the immediate Rights of the Sovereign. Thus in the Days of Queen Elizabeth, the Miniflry did not endeavour to raile a large Revenue, to multiply Honours, or to enlarge the Royal Influence by an Increase of Places. No, they took quite a contrary Method; they were extremely frugal in the Management of the hereditary Estate of the Crown, the greatest Part of which they applied to the publick Service. They repaired and augmented the Navy; they intrusted the Security of the Nation at home to its natural Strength, a numerous and well-disciplin'd Militia; they encouraged a Spirit of Industry and Trade; they employed the Prerogatives of the Crown in promoting the Welfare of the People. By these Methods they surprisingly changed the Face of Affairs, and from a low exhausted and dejected Race of Men, they suddenly raised an active, powerful, and flourishing Nation. By fuch Steps they equally ferved both Prince and People, and were them-felves so happy, as to join Popularity with Power, and to be at once in Favour with the Crown, and on the best Terms imaginable with the Subjects. Neither was the Government ever distressed. Whatever Supplies were necessary, the Nation raised chearfully and with Alacrity; when the Queen asked an Aid of the City of London, they granted her double what she de-1 2 manded; manded; and on the other Hand, when her Majesty had raised a very large Sum for a Service in view, which afterwards appeared to be unnecessary, she returned it to her Subjects. This mutual Considence was the Strength of that Government, which kumbled Faction at home, and triumphed over foreign Foes.

imme-

The fame Management will at any time have the same Effects. To secure the Affection of the British People, the safest and shortest Method is to deserve it. It is a great Mistake to imagine, that the People have a natural Aversion to Power, the contrary is strictly true, if they find Power made Use of to protect them. Our Constitution has placed, and very wifely too, the executive Part of the Government entirely in the Crown; but inafmuch as we are free, it implies that this is placed there for the Benefit of the People. If therefore the Ministers appointed by the King, discharge their Offices as they ought, his Reign will be glorious and his People happy; but if they form to themselves Schemes of Policy inconfishent with the Frame of our Government, if they are weak enough to fancy that Attention to the Royal Will, may attone for neglecting the national Interest, or if they are so wicked as to attempt to divide what the Constitution hath so carefully united, they must necessarily raise a Spirit of Discontent, for which they and not the People are accountable. This is as evident as any thing of a like Nature can be; and a better Use cannot be made of the Freedom of Speech at present permitted us, than to state truly and fairly, as I have done, the first Principles of our Government, so as that they may fall under the Comprehension of the meanest Understanding, and prevent any Man from becoming either a Rebel or a Slave, for want of knowing what Power he ought to obey, or how far he has a Right to refift.

A third Reason, and I shall mention no more, is the present favourable Opportunity. An Opportunity so happy, that for any thing we know our Ancestors never saw the like; and so far as human Foresight can extend, it is highly probable, that if we neglect it, our immediate Posterity will never see such a one again. An Opportunity which if we embrace, we may restore the Constitution to sound Health and its sull Vigour, by purging off every Relick of Corruption, and freeing it from every Stain it has contracted in a long Series of Time. But that this may appear a just and rational Argument, and not a frothy Declamation, which of late Years has become the fashionable Art of political Eloquence, I will take some trouble to explain the Nature of this Opportunity, and to shew the Reader how truly it merits the Encomiums I have befowed thereon.

To apprehend rightly the Felicity of the present Conjuncture, we need only consider the Complaints not long ago made by fome of the worthy Patriots now in Power, they told us that the Wealth of the Nation was idly confumed at home, and that its Reputar tion declined abroad; that our Commerce was in a decaying State; that we had fuffered our Allies to be undone for want of Assistance, till at last we had no Allies at all. They infifted farther upon a yet more intolerable Mischief, that of our being deprived of all Prospect of Redress; they assured us, that the utmost of their Ability was to expose these things to the view of the World, but that by ministerial Arts, our Chains were so effectually rivetted, that they could do no more; that Eloquence was too weak for Numbers, and that we must be fatisfied with knowing our Misfortunes, the Causes and Causers of them, and hope for nothing more. What a State was this! and how effectually do we find ourselves delivered! Ministerial Arts are no more, our Ministers are Men of Probity; the very Patriots, who in the Day of our Distress wished us Deliverance; from such Men therefore we may reasonably expect, what under another Administration it would have heen been Madness to wish; we may expect that the Wounds of the Constitution will be thoroughly searched, and that the great Discase of the Nation, under the Care of such Phyficians, will be radically cured.

On the other Hand, let us confider that the most plausible Excuse, offered in Defence of the late Ministry, was their being cramp'd by an Opposition. It was this they said himdered them from redressing Grievances; it was this that withheld them from such vigorous Measures, as might have restored the Balance of Power in Europe, and raised the British Reputation as high as ever. It was their Apprehensions from an Opposition, that induced them to conclude so great a number of regular Forces necessary; the Jame Caufe they affigned when we expressed our Wonder, that in so many Years of Peace the publick Debt had scarce been lessened. In Thort, according to them it was the Opposition caused all our Mischiefs, and the Nation was given to understand in pretty broad Terms, that if their Affairs were neglected, it was in consequence of the first Law of Nature, Self-Preservation; and that it was ridiculous to fancy a Ministry would risque their own Safety to attend closely to publick Business, while they were thus pushed by an Opposition; but we now see even this Pretence taken away; we are not only freed from all our Terrors of excessive Power lodged 112 in bad Hands, but we have likewise the Satisfaction of feeing, that our Patriot Miniftry can receive no Check from an Opposition: no, the Snare is broken, and we are delivered. Corruption was the Chain that held together a certain Party; its Links are feparated, and the Connection diffolved. To imagine that out of the routed Remains of these flying Troops, such a Force could be collected, as might look our victorious Patriots in the Face, is to fright ourselves with Dreams and Chimeras. The Friends of their Country in Power, and acting for the Service of their Country, can meet with no Opposition; it is impossible they should find any Grounds for it, even if we should imagine that there are Men amongst us bad enough to entertain any fuch Design, it would be to combat Reason with Sophistry, to oppose Fraud to Wildom, and the private Interest of a handful of felfish and ill-principled Men to the Publick Weal, supported by the Voice of the Nation; we must therefore allow it to be certain, that at this Juncture we may hope all things from Men in Power, and need apprehend nothing from the Kefentments of fuch as have lost it.

I had Reason therefore to say, that this was an extraordinary Opportunity, and such a one, as we can scarce hope to recover if it be lost; for when was it known that the People of Great-Britain could absolutely relie upon a Ministry, or that a Ministry was entirely free from the Fear of Opposition? At present nothing can create any new Disputes in the Nation, but slighting or neglecting the Nation's Interests. While these are attended to, Unanimity must reign; and therefore in such a Season all the falutary Laws beforementioned are, if ever, to be hoped for. I know nothing more I have to add, unless it be the resuting all the sew Objections that can possibly be made to what I have proposed; and as the doing this will take up no great Room, I am content to make my Work as compleat as I can by such an Addition.

We may possibly hear it said, that as under this Administration we can have no Apprehensions of Corruption, so there appears no visible Necessity for having Recourse to so many and so strong Remedies, when we have now in a Manner got over the Disease. I desire the Reader will observe that I do not fay this will be objected, but only that it may. We live in an Age wherein many odd things have been faid, and therefore Sufpicions, tho' indifferently founded, may be excused. If ever such an Objection should be made, the Answer is clear and plain. These are Remedies of a preventive Nature, and fuch as cannot operate, unless Corruption should return again. The K

The present Ministry cannot be affected by them. All Parliaments must be for them, because their Constituents are for them; they can therefore find no Difference in Parliaments, continuing for feven Years or for three. But this is not all, if we do not receive these good Things, when these good Men are in Power, when are we like to have them? if this be not a fit time, when will a fit time come? if those who have convinced us of their Expediency will not procure them, who shall? far from any Mark of Diffidence is our making these Demands; on the contrary, it is the sullest Proof that the People confide in the Ministry, and the most signal Token they can afford them of their Esteem. For if weconfider it strictly, it is defiring them to confer the highest Honours on themselves. Surely fuch a Condescension will be remembered in our Histories, and Posterity shall learn to revere the Names of their Benefactors, who fixed the Freedom of their Country on the firmest Basis, before they had well tasted of Power. Future Patriots shall emulate their Virtues, without hoping to reach them; a revived Spirit of Liberty shall enflame a new Race of Poets to fing their Praises, and whatever the British Genius shall perform hereaster, will be referred to them by whom it was preserved.

It may possibly be urged, that in the present critical Conjuncture, there are so many Affairs of Importance, all of so pressing a Nature, that they are alike incapable of bearing either Neglect or Delay. But fure this ought never to be pleaded in Bar to the most important Affairs, and such as are least fit to be postponed. When there are many things of Weight to be done, we ought furely to take them in their turn, and if so, these must certainly have the Preference; all other Matters derive their Consequence from the Connection they have with our Liberty, but these are the very Means of Liberty, without having which, we cannot be fure of having that, or at least how long we shall keep it. This Objection puts me in mind of the strange Discourses that are fometimes made to a fick Man. He is put in Mind, that fuch a Ihing concerns his Estate; such a Thing his Reputation; and fuch another Thing his Family. But the wife Phylician tells him, all these things, Sir, are of great Importance; but be well before you think of them, your Health ought to be your present Care; and when you are able to stir about again, these things will certainly deserve your Attention. We must look in like manner to our political Constitution, if that be in full Vigour, we need not doubt that in time every thing will go K 2 right. right, but while this is on its last Legs, it is impossible for the People to be easy, or to mind any thing else. We now know our Wants; we know too how they may be supplied; and to talk of the Importance of other Things at this time, is to use improper Language, and therefore come from whom it will, it is impossible it should be heard.

But it may be pretended, that how desirous soever all Men may be to carry these several Projects into Execution, yet at present it is impracticable, because, whether we will or no, Time must be wanting; the current Business of the Year must be done, the King's Affairs must not be obstructed; what relates to our Concerns abroad, must be attended to. Be it so. Still all this is nothing to the Purpose, and can be taken for current Coin by none, but such as are in the Humour to be deceived. The most effential Laws beforementioned are not new Things, or fuch as require much Deliberation; most of their Forms we have already, and as to the Matter of them, they cannot now furely admit of a long Debate, when they have been so often scrutinized, and have already the Ministry's Approbation. Add to this, that there is now no Opposition to delay their Passage; let them be but once set on Foot, they will make their own Ways, or the People will have have an Opportunity of seeing who hinders them. The Nation has, as it were, an interlocutory Judgment in its Favour; we only wish to see it made final, and enter'd on Record. This is the Way to end all Disputes, to dissolve all Parties, to heal all Divisions, and by uniting us in one common Cause, to make us the first Nation in Europe, or at least to put us in the Way of being fo very soon. Since therefore this is of fuch infinite Concern, and withall so easy in itself, fince, there is nothing wanting but Resolution to act right, which, as I told you at the beginning of my Pamphlet, enabled a forry Cook to make a good Prime Minister, since there is not one of these Laws, but might keep Pace with a Road-Bill, or at least get to the end of its Journey, with the next AEt in Favour of Westminster-Bridge; methinks the People cannot be thought too eager in their Expectations, nay, I persuade myfelf they are not thought so; I am confident our worthy Patriots are more in haste than they, and long as much to perform their Promises, as an honest Man does to be out of Debt.

Upon the whole it appears I think clear to a Demonstration, that the present Safety and the future Prosperity of our dear Country, depends on the Conduct we pursue at this very Instant. We have now all things in our Power, except the Capacity of judging how long they may continue fo, which is furely a very strong Reason, why we ought to act vigorously according to the Lights we have. The old Serpent CORRUPTION, which has so often threatened to devour our Constitution, lies now at her Feet, and which is more, at our Mercy; but if we do not feize the prefant Opportunity to bruise his Head, he may recover Strength to crawl off to some fe-cret Den, and from thence burst forth again, swollen with fresh Strength and Fury. We are victorious its true, but how little will our Victory redound to our Honour, if it appears we know not how to use it; if instead of following our Blow, we spend our Time in buzzaing, and vain of our Prowess shewn in the late Combat, forget to exert that Wisdom, which must secure to us the Effects of our Conquest.

All Parties will own the Justice of these Restections; all Parties will agree that this is a most critical Conjuncture; let us then act upon this Principle, let us not lose time when it is so precious, let us not estace all Memory of our Ancestor's Errors by a more notorious Blunder of our own. We were drunk with Joy at the RESTORATION, we were confounded with the Suddenness of the Revolution, whereby we lost both Opportunities of securing our political Happiness, but these things are past and cannot be recalled; let the Thoughts of them however put us upon our Guard, and since in many other Respects, we boast of being as wise Men, and as good Patriots as our Forefathers, let us put the Thing out of doubt, and ourselves out of Danger, BY BEING IN OUR SENSES NOW.
